The physicians found no trace of polson incidentally, however, they examined the right hand and discovered that it had been right hand and discovered that it had been crushed by some heavy object, but had any been run over. It is upon this that Coroner Brandon bases his accident theory. He says:

"The girl had evidently raised her hand to hold her hat when she was struck by the locumoitye. The blow crushed the hand, which, acting as a cushion, accounts for the slight fractures on her skull. As she was walking south while crossing the track it must have been the esstbound 11.75 o'clock train which struck her."
